

West End Girls

Shaunna Wharton and her mother, Sandra Lambert, (inset opposite), transformed an abandoned gas station into the tantalizing Soho-like retail space shown on these two pages.

Hyannis, the hub of Cape Cod, is home to the West End, an area that has undergone a major revitalization effort, including very chic Shaunna Clothier, located at South and Sea Street. Count on this brand-new boutique for high-fashion names you would usually have to go to the big city for.

A former buyer for Maxwell & Co. in Falmouth, Shaunna Wharton and her mother Sandra Lambert, who worked for B. Jenney, recently renovated an abandoned gas station and filled with a collection of hip yet tasteful high-end clothing, along with 19th- and 20th-century antiques.

Here you'll find an enticing collection of great lines. Clothing by Johnny Was, Da-Nang, and 3J Workshop offer an urban edge. European lines, such as London's Shirin Guild and Spain's Sita Murt, commune with premium, hard-to-find denim pieces. Vintage trunk tees rest as enticingly as bowls of candy on antique tables and sideboards.

Beyond the great clothes is a dedication to get clients looking great. "If you look badly, it's a poor reflection on us, so we won't send anyone out of here unless they look and feel great," says Wharton.
